

Rainer Maria Rilke

A Selection of Rilke's French Poems

'Portrait of Rainer Maria Rilke'
Paula Modersohn-Becker (German, 1876 - 1907) Wikimedia Commons

Translated by A. S. Kline © 2018 All Rights Reserved.
This work may be freely reproduced, stored, and transmitted, electronically or otherwise, for any non-commercial purpose.

Contents

Translator's Introduction	4
'C'est presque l'invisible qui luit'	5
It's almost the invisible that gleams	5
'C'est qu'il nous faut consentir'	6
We must indeed consent	6
'Cette lumière peut-elle'	7
Can the light render.....	7
'Chemins qui ne mènent nulle part'	8
Paths that lead nowhere	8
'Comme un verre de Venise'	9
As a Venetian glass knows	9
'Comment encore reconnaître'	10
How to recognise once more	10
'Douce courbe le long du lierre'	11
Gentle curve beside the ivy,.....	11
'Eau qui se presse, qui court - '	12
Racing, flowing water – forgetful.....	12
'Là, sous la treille, parmi le feuillage' (Eros:IV)	13
There beneath the vine, among the leaves,	13
'Doux pâtre qui survit' (Ivory fragment).....	14
Sweet shepherd who tenderly	14
'Il suffit que, sur un balcon'	15
It suffices that, on a balcony,	15
'J'ai une telle conscience de ton'	16
I have such consciousness of your.....	16
'Ô la biche : quel bel intérieur'	17
O, the doe: what lovely depths.....	17
'Je ne veux qu'une seule leçon, c'est la tienne,' (The Fountain)	18
I only wish one lesson, which is yours,	18
'Le silence uni de l'hiver'	19
The universal silence of winter.....	19
'N'es-tu pas notre géométrie,'	20
Are you not our geometry,.....	20
Ô mes amis, vous tous, je ne renie'	21

O my friends, all of you, I deny	21
‘Ce ne sont pas des souvenirs’	22
It is not the memories	22
‘Puisque tout passe, faisons’	23
Since everything passes, let us forge	23
‘Qu’il est doux parfois d’être de ton avis,’	24
How sweet sometimes to share your opinion,	24
‘Rose, eût-il fallu te laisser dehors,’	25
Rose, was it necessary to leave you	25
‘Sur le soupir de l’amie’	26
With a friend’s sigh.....	26
‘Tout ici chante la vie de naguère,’	27
Everything here sings the life of long ago,	27
‘Une rose seule, c’est toutes les roses’	28
A single rose is every rose,	28
‘Vers quel soleil gravitent’ (The Orchard: II)	29
Towards what sun gravitate	29
‘V’oici encor de l’heure qui s’argente,’	30
Here once more, the hour that’s silvered	30

Translator's Introduction

Rilke's French poems created during the last four years of his life, after the Duino Elegies and the Sonnets to Orpheus, were an expression of gratitude to the landscape of the Valais in Switzerland, which he felt had made the completion of the former works possible. Quiet but subtle, these poems communicate his deep love of the French language, and provide silvery echoes of the elegies and sonnets, 'in a borrowed tongue'.

‘C’est presque l’invisible qui luit’

It’s almost the invisible that gleams
above the winged slope;
a fragment of night’s clarity remains to a day mixed with silver.

See the light weighs not at all on these obedient contours; while someone consoles the villages out there, for being distant.

‘C’est qu’il nous faut consentir’

We must indeed consent
to such extreme forces;
boldness is our challenge despite the great repentance.

And then it often happens that what we face alters:
the calm becomes storm,
the abyss forms the angel.

Do not fear the detour.
The organ must thunder
for the music to resound with all the notes of love.

‘Cette lumière peut-elle’

Can the light render
a whole world to us?
Is it rather the fresh shadow, quivering and tender,

that entangles us,
that so resembles us
and turns and trembles
about a strange support?

Shadows of frail leaves on road and meadow.
sudden familiar gesture,
that adopts and melds us to a too-fresh clarity.

‘Chemins qui ne mènent nulle part’

Paths that lead nowhere
between two meadows, diverted from their goal
with art, one might say, paths which often have nothing before them

but pure space
and the season.

‘Comme un verre de Venise’

As a Venetian glass knows
this grey, in being born, and the indecisive clarity of which it's to be enamoured, so your tender hands

have dreamed in advance of slowly balancing
our over-full moments.

‘Comment encore reconnaître’

How to recognise once more
what sweet life effected?
Perhaps by contemplating the traces, in my palm,

of those lines and creases we acquire in closing this hand of nothingness on the void.

‘Douce courbe le long du lierre’

Gentle curve beside the ivy,
vague track where the goats linger, lovely light a silversmith would mount in stone.

Poplar in its perfect place opposing its vertical to the slow robust leafage that spreads and stretches.

‘Eau qui se presse, qui court - ’

Racing, flowing water – forgetful water the distracted earth drinks, stay a moment in the hollow of my hand, remember!

Clear and rapid love, indifference almost absence, hastening by, between your coming and going over-much, make a trembling stay.

‘Là, sous la treille, parmi le feuillage’ (Eros:IV)

There beneath the vine, among the leaves,
it so happens that we may divine him:
the rustic brow of a savage child,
the ancient mutilated mouth...

The grapes that front him, growing heavy,
and seeming weary of their heaviness, for a brief moment bring us near the terror of this fine deceptive summer.

And his raw smile, which he infuses into all the fruits of his proud scenery, acknowledges the guile all around,
that gently cradles him to sleep.

'Doux pâtre qui survit' (Ivory fragment)

Sweet shepherd who tenderly survives, in role,
with the remnants of a ewe on his shoulders.

Sweet shepherd who survives
in yellowed ivory,
to play the shepherd.

Like yourself, your absent flock endures,
in the slow melancholy
of your attendant figure,

that summarises, in infinity,
the respite from busy pastures.

'Il suffit que, sur un balcon'

It suffices that, on a balcony,
or at the casement of a window, a woman hesitates...for her to be the one we lose
on seeing her appear.

And if she lifts her arms to tie her hair, tender vase:
how much our loss by that gains sudden emphasis and our misfortune, verve.

‘J’ai une telle conscience de ton’

I have such consciousness of your being, rose entire,
that my assent confounds you with my heart in celebration.

I breathe you in, as if you were,
rose, all of life,
and feel myself the perfect friend of such a friend.

‘Ô la biche : quel bel intérieur’

O, the doe: what lovely depths of ancient forests live in your eyes;
what rounded confidence mixed with so much fear.

All that borne by the vivid gracefulness of your leaps.
But nothing ever reaches the un-possessive innocence of your brow.

‘Je ne veux qu’une seule leçon, c’est la tienne,’ (The Fountain)

I only wish one lesson, which is yours, fountain who plunge back into yourself – that of the dangerous jet to whom falls a heavenly return to terrestrial life.

Nothing is such an example to me as your multiple murmur;
you, light temple column destroyed by your own nature.

In your fall, how each stream of water that ends its dance, moulds itself.
Let me be the student, emulator,
of your innumerable nuances!

Yet, more than your song, what sways me to you, is that moment of delirious silence, when, at night, across your liquid flair, passes your own return, a breath removes.

'Le silence uni de l'hiver'

The universal silence of winter
is replaced, in the air,
by a singing silence;
each voice that woos
adds a contour there perfects an image.

And all this is only the depth of what might be the action of our heart, that surpasses the multiple design of this silence, full of inexpressible daring.

‘N’es-tu pas notre géométrie,’

Are you not our geometry,
window, so simple a form,
that effortlessly circumscribes our vast life?

She, whom we love, never more beautiful than when she appears bordered by you; since you indeed render her almost immortal.

All danger is abolished. Being stands there in the midst of love, around it this little space,
which one controls.

Ô mes amis, vous tous, je ne renie'

O my friends, all of you, I deny none of you; not even that passer-by,
who was only an open, hesitant glance of inconceivable life.

How many times, a being, despite itself, halts, with eye or gesture, the imperceptible flight of others by, for a moment, rendering it manifest.

Those unknown. They form a large part of our fate which every day completes.
O discreet unknown, my heart entertains perfect possession, attracting your gaze.

‘Ce ne sont pas des souvenirs’

It is not the memories
that maintain your presence in me; neither are you mine
by the force of a fine desire.

What renders you here,
is that ardent detour
a slow tenderness
described in my blood.

I have no need to see you appear;
it sufficed me to be born to lose you a little less.

‘Puisque tout passe, faisons’

Since everything passes, let us forge
a passing melody;
that which quenches our thirst conquers us.

Let’s sing what leaves us,
with love and art;
let us be quicker than the swift departure.

‘Qu’il est doux parfois d’être de ton avis,’

How sweet sometimes to share your opinion,
O my body, elder brother, how sweet to be strong
with your strength,
to feel you, leaf, stem, bark,
and all you still may become,
you, so close to the spirit.

You, so frank, so whole,
in your manifest joy
at being this tree of gestures, which, for an instant, slows
the pace of the heavens, to set its life there.

‘Rose, eût-il fallu te laisser dehors,’

Rose, was it necessary to leave you outside, exquisite beloved?
What can a rose do there, where the spell cast on us is exhausted?

Point of return. Here you are who, distraught, share this life with us, this life not so old as you.

‘Sur le soupir de l’amie’

With a friend’s sigh
the whole night rises,
a brief caress
traversing a dazzled sky.

It’s as if an elemental force of the universe, became once more the bearer of all lost love.

‘Tout ici chante la vie de naguère,’

Everything here sings the life of long ago,
not in the sense that consumes tomorrow;
one divines, brave in their primal strength, the wind and sky, the hand, the bread.

It's not a yesterday encroaching everywhere, fixing these ancient contours forever, it's the earth, content with its own image, consenting now to its first day.

‘Une rose seule, c’est toutes les roses’

A single rose is every rose,
and this: the irreplaceable one,
the perfect, the flexible term, framed by the text of things.

How, without her, ever to utter whatever our hopes were,
and those tender intervals within continual departure.

‘Vers quel soleil gravitent’ (The Orchard: II)

Towards what sun gravitate
so many weighty desires?
Of this ardour you utter where is the firmament?

To please one another
must we lean so much?
Let us be light, light on the earth disturbed
by so many opposing forces.

Look at the orchard, then:
so inevitably weighty:
yet of that same ill
it forms the summer’s virtue.

‘V’oici encor de l’heure qui s’argente,’

Here once more, the hour that’s silvered mixed with soft evening the pure metal, and adds to the slow beauty
the slow return of a melodious calm.

Ancient earth resumes, and changes:
a bright star survives our efforts.
Scattered sounds, fleeing the day, gather, returning all to the voice of the waters.

